If architecture was more inclusive would it also be in a stronger position?

Architecture is in the midst of substantial change. How architecture defines itself, how it is practiced, and the range of roles and types of work pursued is all up for grabs.

It’s always a time for a gender-inclusive professional, one that ascertains women and men to better balance professional and personal lives, to realize their full potential, and to stay in the profession.

How might we alter the future of architecture to generate a more equitable, effective and robust profession? What might such a discipline look like? How can architecture make meaningful and compelling contributions to communities, while also being more inclusive?
